Tips for Getting Into the Film Industry

Many young people are interested in film and have dreams of producing a screenplay that will one day be a box office hit. However, breaking into the film industry is not easy and the best way (1) needs to be considered. Not many people can say they (2) edit a film or manage lighting. To acquire these skills film school may be an option but, although (3) may be the obvious place to gain the necessary capabilities, some experts argue that these can be acquired on the job.

Film school is an exciting possibility. The list of available courses is endless and can include scriptwriting, storytelling, sound mixing, editing and visual effects to name but a few. Film school should provide the technical skills needed for a career in film, not to mention necessary contacts who (4) be future directors, sound technicians or scriptwriters.

However, many people question whether film school is worthwhile. Getting a job on a film set rather than spending three years in film school provides you with real-life experience. Working with the professionals, observing (5) and working with technology in the real world are valuable experiences. Meeting people and making contacts is a regular occurrence on set. Above all, more time (6) spent on film production when compared to film school. Another important point is that technology is changing. The technical knowledge gained at film school (7) obsolete by the time you make your first film.

What the film industry calls for is creativity and the ability to adapt to change. These attributes could (8) gained through either path. The most important thing is to reach for the stars and make great things happen. You don't want to be saying in the future 'I (9) have produced great films, but I didn't (10)
